AIRSHIPS NOT DANGEROUS

OF LITTLE USE AS WAR ENGINE SAYS GRANT.

If Close, Could be Shot; If Further Away, Useless, Says U. S. Army General.

New York, Nov. 2.—Major General Frederick Grant, commander of the Department of the East, who was one of the closest followers of the work of the airman at the Belmont Park meet, sees no war peril in the aeroplane. As an engine of war, he thinks they will be found comparatively harmless. At a range less than six thousand feet he is convinced that sharpshooters could easily pick off the best of them, while at a greater height their distance would probably defeat their own purposes.

"In the present unperturbed state of the aeroplane," he says, "it will be useful for scouting purposes, but not formidable as an engine of war. The birdman's lot as a scout will be a dangerous one, for he will be the target of some mighty accurate sharpshooters. If he can escape the bullets, he will be of great aid to the commander in describing the position of the enemy, the lay of the land, the condition of the forces, etc., but the chances of his scouting trip ending in disaster will be ten to one against him.

"I watched the marvelous flights at the International Meet without any feeling of dread at encountering a new and alarming factor in warfare, for I felt confident that our army could have brought down any number of these fliers from a height of a mile. "I would use sharpshooters and not cannon against a hostile aeroplane or fleet of aeroplanes. The army rifle is effective at any range up to 5,000 feet. The aeroplane would be useless at a greater height, for the aviator would not be able to distinguish objects below.

"This is about the way we would go about fighting an enemy in the air.

"Under the command of an officer, armed with a field glass that contains a new mirror device for determining successfully distances, we would station platoons of sharpshooters to watch the enemy's aeroplanes. The officer would communicate the range to the rifle men and they would frequently ally at the man in the flying machine.

"If they should not kill him they could so disable his motor or vital parts of his machine as to cause him to drop to earth."
